

Gone But Not Forgotten: Sandon's Hidden Cemetery

Located approximately 1.7 kilometres outside Sandon, the cemetery is now hidden under the shelter of trees, on the hillside above the road into town. Plotted on early government maps, there were no known burials ...

Located approximately 1.7 kilometres outside Sandon, the cemetery is now hidden under the shelter of trees, on the hillside above the road into town. Plotted on early government maps, there were no known burials in the Sandon cemetery until 1898. Most of the more affluent and "respectable" citizens chose to be buried in New Denver or Kaslo's cemetery, often because their family lived there. In other cases, bodies were shipped even further afield, "back east", or even to Europe. At first, many of the miners were simply buried near where they were killed, high on the mountain slopes, in graves long since forgotten. Many of these men were killed in rockslides or avalanches, and in some cases no body was ever recovered.

